Homework #4

I believe this piece is more of an art than craft. While it does take mastering the craft to make the ability to make this type of art. It is an art piece that fits the definition perfectly with the section that says “intended to be contemplated or appreciated...” It caught my eye more because I saw some of the people in the drawing wearing hats. Researching this piece a little bit I see that it honors the Black Panther Party and addresses police brutality. It illicit the feelings of being a little sad for how this piece represents tragedies done against the Black community. I think the artist is trying to say how oppression against the black community should be recognized and acknowledged by everyone as well as acknowledging the work of the Black Panther Party. I think what this art says to me personally is that bad things happen in the world and they should be acknowledged. It should not be unmentioned, and it should be put out publicly so that people cannot shy away from it. I strongly disagree that artificial intelligence can produce something of equal meaning. I could apply the concept of “art” by viewing software design in an appreciative way. In a way that appreciates the possibility of creating things with computers and technology. I can apply the concept of “craft” by creating good, optimized software and making sure it is up to standard. I think software creation is more of a craft than an art, although there are artistic elements to it. I ask myself if my design and code is good, if it is well documented, and if it is readable. I do usually go back to my work to refactor things to make them clean.
